Tips to Reduce the Effects of High Altitude

If you're skiing out West this winter, you're going to be experiencing elevation ranging from 6,000 to 12,000 feet. How high you ski in the mountain can depend on your ability level, but many resorts offer high-alpine blues and greens. At higher elevations, there is less oxygen and less humidity than at sea level, which can cause a variety of unpleasant symptoms for low-landers if not properly addressed. To help you acclimate smoothly to the high altitude and enjoy every minute of your ski vacation, we compiled a list of tips.

1. DON'T OVER DO IT OFF THE BAT

Physical exertion will affect your response to altitude. So take it easy on the first day at a higher elevation.

2. EAT LIGHT AND DRINK PLENTY OF LIQUIDS

By liquids, we mean the non-alcoholic kind. Alcohol consumption, especially in excess, compounds high-altitude symptoms. The higher elevation's reduced humidity and air can lead to dehydration, so it's important that lots of water is consumed. Also, overeating at altitude can lead to digestive issues.

THE GREAT NORTHERN CATSKILLS' BIG MOUNTAIN EXPERIENCE

HUNTER MOUNTAIN, NY | HUNTERMTN.COM | 518.263.4223

3. GET PLENTY OF SLEEP

The reduced oxygen is already doing its part to tire you out, so make sure you get your fair share of sleep throughout your ski vacation. Overexertion combined with lack of sleep can result in more severe and persistent altitude symptoms.

4. WEAR SUNSCREEN

At high altitude, the sun in the winter is still incredibly strong. This is due to the fact that there is less atmosphere to filter out the ultraviolet rays. This is why wearing sunscreen, with at least an SPF 15, and reapplying frequently is imperative during your ski vacation. Your eyes can burn, too, so always wear sunglasses or goggles with adequate UV protection. Don't be fooled on a cloudy day—you can still get burned at high altitude.

5. PREVENT INJURIES RELATED TO HIGH ALTITUDE

At high altitude, less oxygen impacts your muscle performance, meaning they tire more quickly. Take extra precautions before skiing to reduce injury, like checking your equipment, ski in accordance to your physical ability, learn your way around the mountain, stretch in the morning, be aware of snow conditions and avoid alcoholic drinks at lunchtime.

6. LISTEN TO YOUR BODY

If you experience fatigue, dehydration or any other symptoms typical of altitude sickness, it's a warning sign that you need to decrease your activity and protect yourself. If symptoms persistent, contact a local physician or visit the emergency room.
